Many, from Jung onwards, have noted the apparent similarity between Buddhist instruction and Western psychotherapy. I follow this theme, while also noting the dissimilarities. Buddhism proposes itself as a doctrine which offers a rationally-justifiable perspective on human life, and in this respect it bears comparison with modern styles of cognitive and cognitive-behavioral therapy. I explore this comparison, taking a lead from the writings of Santideva.